MODERN IAGO

Young Wife, Repentant, Sought Atonement in Death.

HUSBAND FORGAVE HER.

Took Back the Wife Who Had Wronged Him, and Kicked Out His False Friend.

But, O, what damned minutes tells he o'er Who dotes, yet doubts; suspects, yet Strongly loves.—Othelio, Act III., Scene 3,

There was a modern Ingo living on West Staty-second street until a week ago, who poisoned the mind of a modern Desdemona against her husband. As a result of his perfidy a sorrow-stricken man was seated yesterday at the bedside of his suffering wife in a public hospital, while a policeman stood guard at the door, because if the woman lives she will have to stand at the bar of the court and answer to the

this letter which the wife left for her husband before she swallowed the paris green which may result in her death; Dearest of Husbands—You must not blame

Dearest of Husbands—You must not blame me for the step I am about to take. My heart is broken; I am overwhelmed by the goodness and loving forgiveness which you accorded me after my wongdoing. When you fogave me that morning I loved you ten thousand times more earnestly than I ever did before, although I have always loved you. Never for a moment since the day we first met have I ceased to love you. But that man came to me, when you were at work, and he was not at work; he told me at first little things of small mement, but as time went on he told me moment, but as time went on he told me graver things. Now I know that he told me lies—buse, wicked lies—but he poisoned my lies—base, wicked lies—but he poisoned my mind.

I never loved the man—I think I always despised him,—but he dove me mad with leal-busy and with resentment against the treatment I thought I was receiving from your hands. I do not think I was accountable for what I did, and when I told you all last Tuesday and you freely torgave me, it seemed as if a great weight had been lifted from my mind.

But since then, my dear, good husband, I have been ill at ease. I fear that although you forgave me so fully, this skeleton will ever rise up between us in the future, and that you will drift away from me. I cannot bear the thought of that, Rather let me die now in the consciousness that I possess at least a part of your love, than live to see you grow cold, and finally learn to either regard me with ind "erence or else to hate me. I am a wicked won. 3, but I can make atonement by ending n, but I can make atonement by ending corthicss life instead of being longer a n to you. So, good-by, my husband. If doing wrong forgive, and in the after retain a few kind memories of your a-hearted SOPHIE.

This was the letter that the miserable ife wrote half an hour before she swalmake her atonement. She was in the sit-ting room of her pretty little flat at No. 244 ixty-first street. Her husband, Nathan Levy, a handsome giant, standing 6 et 5 inches, had left her less than an hour

Thomas Norris is a prisoner at Blackwell's Island. He writes his wife that he mils enjoying life. Mrs. Thomas Norris and tr her four children are without a home and without food.

Here is a contrast. The guilty is fed and sheltered; the innocent suffer.

In September, Norris beat his wife brutal-gir ly and threatened to cut ner throat with a ly and threatened to cut ner throat with a razor. Fearful that he would fulfill his threat she called a policeman. The Magistrate before whom he was taken, committed Norris to the work house for six months. As a farewell Norris said to his wife: "I can have all the fun I want on the Island." He ought to know, for he had been on the Island before.

Mrs. Norris and her four children lived in two rooms of the rear tenement on the top floor at No. 38 Lewis street. The rent was not large, but it was greater than the woman could pay. On Friday last she was evieted and her furniture in its exility, was displayed on the sidewalk, where it remains. A neighbor, poor as Mrs. Norris almost, gave the mother and children

The stranger poisoned the mind of the wife against her husband. A week ago the husband learned the story, and threw Block out of his home. Then, as many of the neighbors had guessed the story, he moved to Sixty-first street to begin life anew.

"Get well, dear," he whispered to her yesterday as she was sinking into slumber from the effects of the oplates which had been administered; "get well for my sake."

And the woman answered him with a pressure of the hand.
